For the school festival, Jack’s class created a ring-toss game. During the first test, most rings missed because the bottles were too far away. Some students wanted to make the game easier, while others worried that prizes would run out.
The class measured three throwing lines: one for young children, one for older students and one for adults. Each player receives five rings. A small prize requires two hits, and a large prize requires four. The class also made signs so visitors could understand the rules without a long explanation.
At the festival, the new system worked well. Younger children enjoyed succeeding, and adults still found the game challenging. When only a few large prizes remained, the class did not change the rules. Instead, it displayed a notice and offered extra game tokens. Jack learned that a fair stall needs clear rules, testing and honest information.
