A difficult workplace decision – the first plan

When Amelia reached the community garden on Monday at 8:15, the purpose was clear: the group had to check a route. The preparation appeared complete until the timetable had changed. Instead of reacting immediately, the group compared the available information, asked which people would be affected and checked the organiser's instructions. It finally chose to update the timetable and send it to the group. Consequently, the presentation began on time. In a short review, Amelia explained that a successful outcome was not enough on its own; the reasons, communication and consequences also had to be examined. The group therefore documented what it would keep and what it would change next time.

A difficult workplace decision – what changed

When Leo reached the media room on Wednesday at 15:30, the purpose was clear: the group had to plan a class activity. The preparation appeared complete until the first meeting place was unavailable. Instead of reacting immediately, the group compared the available information, asked which people would be affected and checked the organiser's instructions. It finally chose to move to a suitable room and tell everyone. Consequently, the plan worked with only a short delay. In a short review, Leo explained that a successful outcome was not enough on its own; the reasons, communication and consequences also had to be examined. The group therefore documented what it would keep and what it would change next time.
