Saving a local factory – the first plan

When Ruby reached the school kitchen on Wednesday at 10:45, the purpose was clear: the group had to collect useful information. The preparation appeared complete until the weather changed the original plan. Instead of reacting immediately, the group compared the available information, asked which people would be affected and checked the organiser's instructions. It finally chose to choose an indoor activity. Consequently, the report included all key facts. In a short review, Ruby explained that a successful outcome was not enough on its own; the reasons, communication and consequences also had to be examined. The group therefore documented what it would keep and what it would change next time.

Saving a local factory – what changed

When Ethan reached the town park on Friday at 9:30, the purpose was clear: the group had to help a younger group. The preparation appeared complete until a key person was absent. Instead of reacting immediately, the group compared the available information, asked which people would be affected and checked the organiser's instructions. It finally chose to divide the missing person's task among three pupils. Consequently, the activity started safely. In a short review, Ethan explained that a successful outcome was not enough on its own; the reasons, communication and consequences also had to be examined. The group therefore documented what it would keep and what it would change next time.
